Dear Educator,

We are pleased to introduce and welcome you to the International Center of Photography's (ICP) Fall 2008 exhibitions including: Susan Meiselas: In History, Cornell Capa: Concerned Photographer, and Living with the Dead: W. Eugene Smith and World War II.

To better acquaint you and your students with the content of the exhibitions, ICP provides Guided Tours, Self-guided Tours, Digital Workshops, and Writing Workshops. For the most tailored experience, our Museum Educators lead guided tours focusing on the themes of your curriculum, facilitating dynamic discussions that emphasize visual literacy and looking closely. Please see the attached Group Tour Guidelines and Information Page for more information.

In an effort to provide you with the most comprehensive museum-based learning experience, for every exhibition cycle we create pre-visit activities designed as a starting point from which you and your students can view and discuss our exhibitions and post-visit activities designed to transfer their museum experience to classroom learning and projects. While these materials provide a framework for exploring the themes presented in the exhibitions, we encourage you to modify these materials to the needs of your students. This packet contains activities designed for Susan Meiselas: In History, Cornell Capa: Concerned Photographer, and Living with the Dead: W. Eugene Smith and World War II.

Additionally, ICP has developed an array of Education and Public Programs to support all of these exhibitions including curator and artist panels. To learn more about public programming for these exhibitions, please call 212-857-0001 or visit us online at www.icp.org.

Again, we look forward to welcoming you and your students to the International Center of Photography for our Fall 2008 exhibitions!

Introduction

When Cornell Capa founded the International Center of Photography (ICP) in 1974, he hoped to create an institution that would present and disseminate the work of “concerned photographers.” Capa coined the phrase to describe photographers with the primary humanitarian goal of creating photographs that would educate and change the world, rather than simply explore aesthetic choices or record events. It is a phrase that describes not only Capa’s older brother Robert Capa, whose Spanish Civil War and World War II photographs informed the world about important political situations, but Cornell Capa himself, whose photos of socio-political struggles in Central and South America and elections in the United States are presented in Cornell Capa: Concerned Photographer. The exhibition has been organized in commemoration of his influential life which ended at the age of 90 on May 23, 2008.

The phrase, “concerned photographer,” can describe the work of Susan Meiselas and W. Eugene Smith as well, whose photographs will be the subject of simultaneous exhibitions on display at ICP. Susan Meiselas: In History will present the work of a photographer who has sought to develop a relationship with her subjects beyond what most photographers attempt. In the late 1970s, she documented the violent struggle of the Sandinistas against Nicaragua’s oppressive Somoza regime.

Twenty five years later, she returned to the site of her most famous photographs and filmed the residents’ reactions to these photographs. In the 1990s, she traveled to the Kurdish regions of the Middle East to document the mass graves and deportation of the Kurdish minorities from their homes. In addition, she also helped them gather existing photographs to create an archive of memories. In Living with the Dead: W. Eugene Smith and World War II, students will see eleven photographs by W. Eugene Smith, an intrepid war photographer who captured life on a naval vessel and during battle, despite the constant risk of injury.

Through viewing these museum exhibitions, students will explore how photographers relate to and affect their subjects and what it means to be a “concerned photographer” who wants to educate and change the world with his or her pictures. The accompanying activities will help students to deepen their understanding of the ideas addressed in the exhibitions and provide them with hands-on activities that engage them with the photography. These lessons and activities are broken down as pre-visit and post-visit activities for junior high (6 – 8) and high schools (9 – 12). They are designed to be integrated with Social Studies, Global History, Humanities, Arts, and English Language Arts curricula.

For the junior high school plans, students will delve into the relationship between photographers and their subjects and how a photograph can help or hurt its subject. Students will conduct photographic studies of a person and share their work with that person in order to learn more about them.

For the high school plans, students will investigate the notion of the “concerned photographer.” They will develop persuasive photographic essays on an issue they feel strongly about and then will think about how best to share their essays with the world.

The lesson plans have been conceived of not as scripts but rather as suggestions to be applied to any grade and with any adaptations that teachers might feel are appropriate. They can stand alone or as lessons prior to and/or following a visit to ICP.

Susan Meiselas: In History, Cornell Capa: Concerned Photographer, and Living with the Dead: W. Eugene Smith and World War II educational materials were written by Jackie Delamatre for the International Center of Photography.

Susan Meiselas: In History is made possible by Shell.

Cornell Capa: Concerned Photographer was made possible with lead gifts from the ICP Exhibitions Committee, Robert and Gayle Greenhill, Joel and Anne Ehrenkranz, Linda Hackett for C. A. L. Foundation, Christian K. Keese, Rick and Ellen Kelson, The Liman Foundation, New York City Department of Cultural Affairs, The Marshall Rose Family Foundation, Arnold and Louise Sagalyn, The Bernard Lee Schwartz Foundation, and Lois and Bruce Zenkel. Additional support was provided by Lynne and Harold Honickman, Sanford Luger and Ellen Samuel, Robert and Meryl Meltzer, and other individual donors.

Living with the Dead: W. Eugene Smith and World War II brings together eleven works selected from a group of Smith’s original exhibition prints recently donated to the International Center of Photography by Leslie Teicholz, Smith’s studio assistant.

Pre-Visit: The Photographer-Subject Relationship

Overarching Question	What is the relationship between photographers and their subjects?
Supporting Questions	How are a photographer's perceptions of a subject different from the subject's perceptions? How can a photograph help forge a relationship? How can a photograph misrepresent and even hurt its subject?
Objective	To explore how photographs can help or hurt their subjects
Suggested Time Frame	1 class period
Resources	<ul style="list-style-type: none">• Visual image below
Related Image	Plate 1: The family of Kamaran Abdullah Saber , Susan Meiselas Plate 2: The exhumation , Susan Meiselas Plate 3: Wounded, dying infant , Eugene Smith
Preliminary Discussion	<ol style="list-style-type: none">1. The day before this lesson, ask students to bring in a photograph and article from a newspaper or magazine in which some community issue has been reported on. For instance, if teenage pregnancy is a big issue in the community they might bring in an article and photograph about it. At the start of the lesson, ask students to discuss with a partner how the issue has been represented by the newspaper or magazine. Do they agree with how the subjects have been portrayed? For instance, they may think that teenage mothers are portrayed as naïve when they know many who are not.2. Next, show the photograph of the family of Kamaran Abdullah Saber to your students. Ask them to describe what they see. What assumptions might they have about the people in this photograph? What can they guess about the story behind the photograph?3. This is a photograph Susan Meiselas took of a Kurdish family whose relative (Kamaran Abdullah Saber, seen in the photograph they hold) was killed in a student demonstration against Saddam Hussein in Iraq in 1991. Meiselas went to the Middle East to document the lives of the Kurds, a minority ethnic group that lives in many Middle Eastern countries, including Iran, Iraq, and Turkey. Throughout the years, the Kurds have sought autonomy within these countries but have faced violent opposition from the country's rulers. In the 1980s, the Iraqi government murdered, deported, and/or destroyed the villages of thousands of Kurds in part to make way for an influx of the majority ethnic group, the Arabs, to the oil-rich parts of the country. In 1988, this Iraqi government campaign was called Anfal ("the Spoils of War").4. Now that they know what the Kurds experienced before this photograph was taken, ask students if their assumptions about the people have changed.

5. Show students The exhumation. Ask them to use clues in the photograph to make guesses about what is happening in the photograph. Tell them that it depicts the exhumation of a mass grave of Kurds killed near an Iraqi military headquarters (double-check with curator). An exhumation is a digging up of a grave – often to collect evidence of crimes perpetrated.

6. Ask them to imagine that they are photographers entering an area in which such atrocities had occurred. What would their goals be as photographers? What would they want the world to understand about their subjects? What might the Kurdish people want the world to see through these photographs? In what circumstances might a photographer's goals conflict with a Kurd's goals?

7. Finally, as a class, look at W. Eugene Smith's Wounded, dying infant. What do students notice? This photograph was taken in 1944 during World War II. Ask students to imagine that they are one of these soldiers looking at this photograph many years after it was taken. What might they think about the way they are portrayed? Would they be comfortable with this portrayal or would they wish to change it?

Overarching Question	What is the relationship between photographers and their subjects?
Supporting Questions	How are a photographer's perceptions of a subject different than the subject's perceptions? How can a photograph help forge a relationship? How can a photograph misrepresent and even hurt its subject?
Objective	To explore how photographs can help or hurt their subjects.
Suggested Time Frame	3 short class periods
Resources	<ul style="list-style-type: none">• Visual images below• Cameras (disposable, Polaroid, or more advanced)• Photo albums or other display materials
Related Images	Plate 1: The Family of Kamaran Abdullah Saber , Susan Meiselas Plate 2: The Exhumation , Susan Meiselas Plate 3: Wounded, dying infant , Eugene Smith
Preliminary Discussion	1. For this activity, students will choose a person in their community to make the focus of a photographic essay. They will then bring the photographs back to the person to see if the subject thinks the photographs represent them accurately. For Susan Meiselas, this return to the subjects was an important part of her process. Tell students that Meiselas returned both to the Middle East and to another site of her photography, Nicaragua, many times after photographing there. "We take pictures away and we don't bring them back," Meiselas said. "That became a central quest for me." She considered it a gesture of respect to bring the photographs back. "I was fascinated by the difference in how I saw people and how they saw themselves," she said. "I wanted them to look at the photographs and tell me what they did or didn't share about who they were." 2. First, students must choose their photo essay's subject. They might choose this person by focusing on an important issue, such as poverty and selecting someone who is integral to the issue. Or they might just select a person who is important to them, such as an inspiring teacher or a grandmother. After receiving the subject's permission, they should do some preliminary research about them. Generate a list of questions with your class that they might ask their subject before they photograph them: <ol style="list-style-type: none">a. What is most important to them in life?b. How do they want to be known or remembered?c. What do they consider their greatest accomplishment?

3. Equip students with cameras and send them to capture their particular subject in their daily life or involved in a special event. If your class is not a photography class with the necessary equipment, you can provide them with disposable cameras for the day. If students already have cameras, they can use their own. Make sure students arrange the visit beforehand so that the subject is aware of when they will be photographed.

4. Back in the classroom, ask students to arrange their photographs in albums (or in another format, possibly with quotes or captions). Then have them share their photographs with a partner. Ask them to talk to each other about what the photographs might imply about the subject. What kinds of assumptions does their partner have about the subject based on the photo? Do these assumptions match with what the student photographer wanted to capture? Do they match with what they know their subject wanted captured?

5. Finally, send the students back to their subjects to share the photographs they've taken. Meiselas has said that in each return to the scene you discover new facts or knowledge. Encourage students to ask their subjects what they think about the photographs. Do the photos represent them the way they would like to be represented? Have the subjects shared who they are or have they been guarded?

6. As a class, discuss and present the results. Were the subjects surprised by anything they saw? Were they upset by any of it? Were they pleased by the effort? Did the students learn something new by returning to the scene, as Meiselas did?
